No. 4,729,016, there is described a triple flame curtain system in which combustible elements such as propellants and oxidizers are conducted in a heat-exchange relationship with a fluid such as air by means of a plurality of separate channels, each channel including a combination of tubes, pores, spaces, or apertures of porous materials which form the exterior of a cylindrical structure, the interior walls of which are the hollow tubes, the spaces, or the apertures. The separate channels are each in heat-exchanging relationship with one another to permit distribution of a flowing medium, and the combustible elements are passed through the respective channels with the flow of the medium through the channels to the outer walls of the cylindrical structure through which the combustible elements pass and are ignited. The burning elements are allowed to remain in the channels until their combustible elements have been fully burned, and then they are exhausted to the atmosphere through outlets in the outer cylindrical walls of the structure. This system has proved to be highly effective and has gained wide acceptance in the industry for various purposes, including propellant rocket motors, explosives, training systems, and gaseous-fueled rocket engines. In U.S. Pat. No. 4,768,390, there is described a triple flame curtain system which uses a shell or cover which is concentrically aligned with the end walls of the cylindrical structure defining the combustion channel, the shell or cover being spaced from and surrounding the combustion channel, and being connectable to it by a line of flammable material which passes between the shell or cover and the combustion channel. The shell or cover is made of a low-burn material, which ignites in the presence
