With a lifetime track record of more than 40 years, Nuclear Energy Institute (NEI) is uniquely qualified to lead the way in exploring the opportunities, challenges, and complexities of this ever-changing and evolving energy sector. Across industries and borders, our members range from startups to Fortune 100 companies. We tackle the world's greatest energy challenges, whether the focus is new nuclear development or the reliability and costs of existing, aging nuclear power plants. For the past 10 years we have been deeply engaged in the development of the Comprehensive Nuclear-Test-Ban Treaty (CTBT). As NEI's membership of the CTBT arms control initiative is aimed at promoting awareness about nuclear technologies and opening up a dialogue with a range of stakeholders, its development team is uniquely placed to understand the rapidly changing international context and to advise NEI's membership in any decision that requires a globally relevant viewpoint. We have therefore launched a new paper entitled "The Non-Proliferation Value of the Comprehensive Test-Ban Treaty and its implications for civil nuclear technology," which has been prepared by our members and industry experts. It summarizes the widely varying assessments of the non-proliferation value of CTBT, explores the many potential roles of the treaty in the nuclear industry, and puts the CTBT's impact on the role of international civil nuclear cooperation in a global context. This document was compiled by members of the NEI CTBT team. The paper has been prepared to provide a global point of view about the unique potential of the CTBT to address the non-proliferation challenges in the nuclear industry and to inform the U.S. policy makers as well as the scientific community about the implications of the CTBT on nuclear technologies.
