Survival data from 467 patients with isolated lung cancer were collected at the time of first diagnosis. The influence of various factors on long-term survival were evaluated using the Cox-Mantel test for univariate and the Cox regression multivariate analysis for multivariate analysis of survival. Lung cancer of oat-cell type had the best long-term survival. The survival in cases where adjuvant chemotherapy had been used also appeared to be better than in cases where no chemotherapy had been used. In contrast, lung cancer of bronchioloalveolar (BAC) type had the worst survival. The role of positive surgical margins is unclear and needs further evaluation. Negative surgical margins in cancer of non-oat-cell types did not adversely affect the survival. Age, sex, tumor size, growth pattern, location, histological types, and stage did not affect the survival. The survival was independent of the extent of disease and the performance status of the patient. Discovery of a series of novel selective 5-HT_{2C} receptor agonists as promising therapeutic agents for obesity and type II diabetes. A series of novel 5-HT_{2C} selective agonists, possessing a naphthalene-2-carbonitrile scaffold, with novel C-5-spirocyclopropylmethoxy substituents, were investigated for their biological activities in vitro. In the rat isolated organ bath 5-HT_{2C} agonists, one compound exhibited very high selectivity for 5-HT_{2C} and moderate affinity (IC₅₀ = 4.2 nM) at 5-HT_{2B}. Two other compounds (14 and 18) exhibited higher potency (IC₅₀ = 4.1 nM, and 15.7 nM, respectively) for 5-HT_{2C} than 5-HT_{2B}. This was associated with compound
