The Cost of Deviating From Common Practice So, a colleague of mine recently had a meeting with his supervising principal, and their discussion ended with something along the lines of, "Well, we'd really like to do X, but we need to be able to justify it to the district (read: board) so we have to consider the cost. Does this make sense?" I suppose that's not too surprising, since he's not working in a school setting. But, I'm struck by how "common practice" as a rationale for doing something is incredibly common in schools. We explain it as an "obstacle" to learning, for example, and lay claims to the fact that no one can tell us anything about "what the kids really need"

when we work to make things happen (or make them seem like they're happening). I'm also struck by how rarely (if ever) this is actually grounded in some real cost-benefit analysis of what's being proposed
